Community Projects

1. A study entitled "A study of two different populations in their willingness to provide personal and impersonal helping services" has been completed for the Blood Services Organization of the Phoenix area. The research investigated the tendency of two potential donor populations to provide either personal (blood) or impersonal (money) helping services. A college sample was found to be significantly more compliant with a request for blood donations than a sample of middle class suburban residents. However, the groups did not differ in frequency of compliance with a request for a monetary contribution. As the Blood Services Organization is wholly concerned with donations of blood, it was recommended that efforts to recruit volunteer blood donors be intensified on the Phoenix area campuses. A report of this project has appeared in the National Blood Services magazine "In Vivo".
2. A series of studies of litter control has been conducted in consultation with the Phoenix City Departments of Sanitation and Parks and Recreation. Five experiments have consistently demonstrated the efficacy of norm salience procedures in the reduction of littering behavior in public places such as city parking garages, amusements parks, and lobbies of public buildings. The results of these studies will form the basis of a grant proposal designed to obtain funding for an investigation of effective norm salience techniques that are suitable for inclusion in mass media anti-littering campaigns.
3. A consumer education program has been developed with Chicanos por la causa, a Phoenix-based community agency with a primarily Mexican- American constituency. The program is designed to provide information to inner city residents concerning compliance techniques that are often employed by salesman, merchandisers, and fund-raisers. These techniques frequently involve psychological pressures and, consequently, can be categorized around social psychological concepts that have been demonstrated to lead to compliance (e.g., commitment, reciprocation, dependency, consistency). The goals of the program are to inform participants of the existence of such techniques that derive from a common psychological concept, and, finally, to provide means for resisting the influence of the pressures.
